The Daily Quote

"Typically when Republicans retreat to swank locales like this ahead of a fresh Congress, they emerge with some sort of grand plan... But the GOP gathering that ended Friday ended up being little more than a chocolate-infused meet-and-greet... More than 250 Republicans milled about the Hershey Lodge, name tags swinging from their necks, wondering what exactly they were doing here... Republicans never expected to solve all their problems here, but the Congress of Tomorrow retreat offered little in the way of what will actually come tomorrow, next week, next month or next year... Republicans left here — and many of them didn't even stay until the end — with no better idea about how they will fund the Department of Homeland Security at the end of February. No better idea whether they'll get the rewrite of the Tax Code they've been pining for. All they've learned is that House bills typically don't stand a chance to pass the Senate. There are also unsolved divisions among House Republicans on next week's 20-week abortion ban bill, with some female members calling the bill too aggressive."
